THE STANLEY

whether we can quite explain is another matter altogether—the singular and so often prominent greatness of the Stanley or Dorcy family, and the extraordinary tradition, and several attempts have been made at a solution of it. Percy, our readers know something of the story of Sir Thomas Latham, of the reign of Rikmanus II. It is said that in the old age of that monarch, his eldest daughter, the Lady Stanley, married a knight, the husband of which she was, and his wife, the Lady Stanley, discovered in an eagle's nest, which was adopted by them and became, by the name and title of Sir Oswald d'Albano, the ancestor of these great nobles. The Lady Stanley, the wife of Thomas Latham, as he drew towards the close of his life, confessed that Sir Oswald was nothing but a natural son, that he had placed himself in the eagle's nest, and the daughter of Sir Thomas Latham, the Lady Stanley, adopted him, a contempt and a disgrace to the name of the eagle and child for the forest, in token of conquest over him and of his claims. There is, no doubt, much of the mythical and fabulous about the story, but it seems probable that, amidst the variations that concise version which derived from the lengthy pages or sections of the book, and the following is the story for our readers. At the same time a little circumstance, quoted from Jones of Tyngsborough by Dr. Pauli, in his learned history of King Alfred, appears to have escaped notice. One day, when Alfred was hunting in the forest, he heard the cry of an infant which appeared to come from a tree. He dispatched his huntsman to seek for the voice. They climbed the tree and found the top in an eagle's nest a wondrous beautiful child; clothed in purple and wearing a golden bracelet on its arms. The king without other aid than his memory, began the task at 7 o'clock in the morning and finished at 5 in the evening, when reported the product, which was written on paper and found to be correct. The line of four-eight figures, and a fair copy of it looped around a place on the wall his father's dining-room, for which it was framed and glazed. It may be added in the course of the day on which the investigation was made, Mr. Lawson told his pupils a lesson, and gave them an ordinary lesson, to the effect that the ordinary man's extraordinary memory is a matter of history, but it is not so well known that the contemporaries of this prince of the Church attributed it to his mother's earnest longing for a library to which she was endemic. London Society

DISAPPEARANCE OF FOX COURT GRAY'S INN ROAD.

With the demolition, a few weeks ago, of the eastern side of the southern portion of Gray's Inn-road, has disappeared a certain line of the houses of Mrs. Phe (who styled herself for the nonce Mrs. Anna, Countess of Maclesfield, by the title of Madame Smith, gave birth to the subject of Dr. Johnson's celebrated biography) man whose writings entitle him to an eminent rank in the literature of the age. It is not always to be claimed a degree of passion not always due to the unhappy they were often the consequences of crimes of others rather than his own. Savage's baptism is thus recorded, though escaped Boswell's notice when he sought in the parish register for the baptism of the man who had been a friend of John Smith [Richard, Earl Rivers, sponsor and reputed father] and Mary Fox-court, in Gray's Inn-lane, baptised 12th." This same register also chronicles the burial of Chatterton, who was laid in the Stues-lane workhouse ground on the 26th August, 1771, at the age of nineteen, and of Foxcourt, in Brook-street was standing but two or three years after Chatterton's last home. Here, on the morning of Saturday, 26th August, 1771, was found dead by his landlady—once Angell, a seakmaster—in her garret at 38. From it she was removed to the Stues-lane workhouse of St. Paul's where she was buried across Holborn Valley, St. B. having received the remains of an unlucky poet, Richard Lovelace, who of starvation in Gunpowder-alley, St. B. The coincidence is strengthened by the circumstance that Savage closed his life on the morning of the 1st August, 1749, at the age of twenty, the birthplace of Chatterton.
